Nature vs Concrete

Members of Photowalkers and TEPC believe that the beautiful planet we live on is in crisis, that sustainability and ecology require urgent action, and that photographers play an essential role in capturing and portraying Earth's beauty and its fragility.

The past year, if nothing else, has shown that each and every person plays a significant role in our world by working together to face major challenges. To this end, we put together our virtual exhibition to highlight what we need to protect, and how we can seek to solve the environmental challenges that lay ahead using our photographs to inspire action.

Our exhibition is virtual and highlights the beauty of nature, its vulnerability, and how to reduce our impact. We can, after all, heal Mother Earth by taking note of our behavior and effecting change.

Gallery 1: Nature of Taiwan

From the majestic mountains of Central Taiwan, Neil Wade captures sunrise over the peaks of Yushan, while Alton Thompson and Shashank Keshavmurthy show the importance of water to us. Yone Liao captures the elegant foliage of vegetation and trees.

Kenneth Dickson bought a camera many years ago to take photographs of his travels around Taiwan. Thirty thousand photos later, he finally joined Photowalkers in Taipei, a group that encourages everyone to get out and take photographs wherever they are. Inspired by the owner of Dawana restaurant, Jing-Shung Hsu introduces Lily Wen as one of the leaders in saving Mother Earth from ourselves. Jairam Poupart's Wind Turbines hints at the changes we need to make in our consumption of the world's resources. Lastly, photographer Shyh-Shiun Jerry Wang hones in on the ordinary heroes of our world, the recyclers.
